DON ALFONSO

Alfonso Iaccarino has long been a torch-bearer for southern Italian cuisine. Back in 1973, he founded a restaurant in his home town of Sant'Agata sui due Golfi that took the bountiful fresh ingredients and the great culinary traditions of the Campanian region and elevated them into something very special.

Today, flanked by younger generations of his family, this world-famous chef and the gastronomic temple he created remains a point of reference for lovers of the finest cuisine on their visits to the Sorrentine peninsula and the Amalfi Coast.

Eternally elegant, an Amalfi hospitality icon

The Istituto Nazionale Tumori IRCCS ‘Fondazione G Pascale’ and its associated Melanoma Foundation (Fondazione Melanoma) have been working with Takis Srl for many years to develop melanoma vaccines and monoclonal antibodies.

Takis Srl is a biotech company based in the towns of Castel Romano and Ariano Irpino. It was founded in 2009 by a group of scientists from Merck Research Laboratories (MRL). Fifteen years of experience in the discovery of new molecules have allowed Takis to develop drugs for the treatment of cancer and viral diseases.

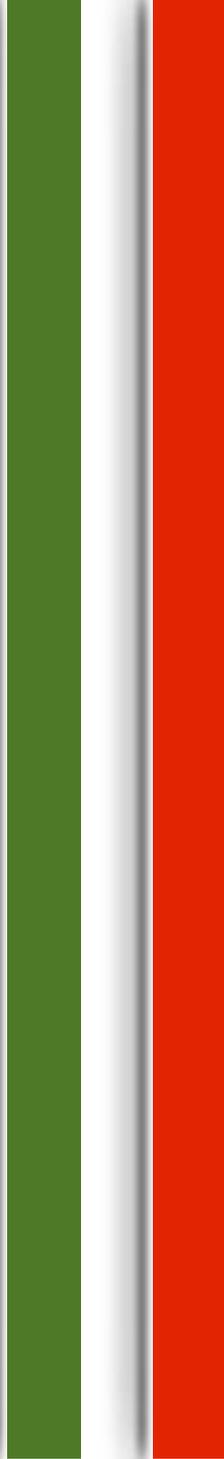

Pooling their experience in the sector, the IRCCS ‘Fondazione G Pascale’, the Melanoma Foundation and Takis have been working together since the start of the current coronavirus epidemic to develop a COVID-19 vaccine. They are working on a 'genetic vaccine', a swift and efficient technique which quickly activates the immune system and allows the vaccine to adapt to the evolution of the virus as it mutates over time.

Takis is one of the few organisations in the world to have invested heavily in the ambitious project while adhering strictly to drug development safety guidelines. With the collaboration of Rome's Spallanzani Hospital, clinical trials of four possible vaccines are already being carried out, with initial results expected by mid-April. Once a potentially effective vaccine is singled out, we will need to have it approved via a lengthy and extremely costly process of human trials.

Together the Pascale Foundation, the Melanoma Foundation, Takis and the Spallanzani can make an enormous contribution towards overcoming the challenge of this immense health emergency, and protecting the most vulnerable – such as the elderly, cancer patients, and health workers. But we can only do this through private financial support, as state and institutional funds are not currently available within the urgent timeframe required.

Time is of the essence at this point. We are ready to move forward with a project whose next stage will, we estimate, cost around €2 million. This includes large-scale production of the vaccine, regulatory studies and the first stage of clinical trials which will be carried out in collaboration with the Melanoma Foundation. To all those who are able to support us in this vital work, we extend our deepest thanks.

The research project

Grazie
